Lord GRANVILLE to Lord LORRAINE. The British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, dated Oct. 17, 1872, that the entire Pamir, from the north to the Sarykol Sea and the sources of the Pandja, unquestionably belong to Russia's sphere of influence. No doubt the apathy of the Chinese in past years has strengthened Russian pretensions. The Chinese, for instance, allowed Russia to advance up to Irkeshtan, in Western Kashgaria, and since 1879 Russia has openly claimed it, as a concession made by Yarkand Bashi, at a time, however, when he was in revolt against China, and de facto, but not de jure, ruler. It is true that the claim was disputed by the Marquis Tseu in 1880 when negotiating the treaty relating to Kulджа, but we are not aware that any official recognition of the protest was made by Russia either at the time or subsequently. Only after the expulsion of their troops from Alikash did the Peking authorities begin to wake up to the fact that Russia was not joking, but really meant business. Shortly after that event they requested the Governor of the province of Kashgaria, which borders on the Pamirs, to give his opinion upon the Pamir question. That official sent a memorandum to Peking, which was duly received. The Governor showed that it was in China's interest, and especially in the interest of the province of Kashgaria, that the Pamirs should become the property of England. He added that if the Russians possessed themselves of this territory, the commerce of Kashgaria with India would be seriously hampered. China ought to do as in her power to unite the Pamirs with India, as this was the only means of saving China's commerce by land. Accordingly with a view to interesting England in the matter Captain Younghusband was well received by the Chinese officials when in Turkestan. China was reported later on to be prepared to take a bold stand in the matter, but she seems to have done nothing, and would not doubt prefer that England should pick the chestnuts out of the fire for her. Possibly the Peking Government think that they have only to stand out against the Russian claim as they did over the Kulджа business and Russia will eventually give way. But if the Russian Government has decided that the time has come for a forward movement they will not be daunted by the flourish of a Chinese fan, and it is quite possible that the seizure of Alikash is but the preliminary step to a well planned endeavor to recover the Kulджа and to eventually annex the whole of Kashgaria.

The country known as the Pamirs is a mountainous region lying to the north of Cashmere, and from the height, vastness, and grandeur of these mountains, Captain Younghusband says it seems to form the culminating point of Western Asia. Thibet has been called "the roof of the world," but the gullion officer just named thinks that the Pamir region merits the title. The name, he says, singularly appropriate, for once through the gorges which lead up from the plains one enters a region of broad, open valleys separated by comparatively low ranges of mountains. These valleys are known as pamirs—pamir being the term applied by the natives of those parts to a particular kind of valley. The Tugh-Dum-Bash Pamir runs as low as 10,000 feet; but, on the other hand, at its upper extremity the height is over 15,000 feet, and the other Pamirs vary from twelve or thirteen to fourteen thousand feet above sea level. That is, the bottoms of these Pamir valleys are level with the higher summits of the Alps. During the whole three weeks Captain Younghusband was on the Tugh-Dum-Bash Pamir the thermometer never fell more than five degrees below zero Fahrenheit. It will be seen therefore that the country in dispute cannot be of great value to any Power except as a base for future operations. Kulджа, on the other hand, which China succeeded in snatching back from the Muscovite grip, is a fertile oasis in the Mongolian wilderness of rocks and deserts which in times of peace is the key and granary of Western Mongolia. The Chinese are anxious to get it back, and so long as she keeps her eyes and hands off India or its frontier, it would be bad policy on the part of England to attempt to build her.

What has China ever done for England? Has she ever made a single concession to her voluntarily, or shown the faintest sign of friendly feeling? One of the first things the Chinese did on reestablishing themselves in Kashgaria was to exclude the tents of Assam. Yet when they find Russia advancing into the Pamirs they desire England, for their good friend. Just so England, the monkey in the fable mist the good offices of the cat. But the old Lion is, we hope, more wary than the smaller feline, and will object to burning his paws for the delectation of any simian.

The French Bank of Indo-China commenced to issue one-dollar notes on the 25th July. The Progres de Saigon says that merchants who are not much to be trusted in the matter of the circulation of these notes will be distressed to the country, it being a means of diverting silver from the place by substituting a fictitious value for it, and further depreciating the value of the Mexican dollar, which is already very low.

In the trade circular, dated 30th July, Messrs. Y. M. & Co. of Saigon, state that there is not much to be done in the market except to confirm their late advice of continued high figures. Rainy weather continues to the benefit of planting operations, which are now being carried on everywhere with vigour; the labour required for the fields is taken off river work and with the ability planters possess of holding their stocks after the good prices they have been receiving the entire season, may account for the advanced state of the market.
